BRIDLE WAS TORN OFF

Makes Perilous Ride Without

Frazier Ray, a well known young deliveryman of this city experienced some thrilling sensations Sunday that he is not likely soon to forget. He was with a party fishing at Brockmyer's pond, and when the time came to depart, Frazier was dispatched to the pasture to bring in the team. After a tedious search he finally found the horses, but discovered that both had lost their bridles. He displayed courage to mount what he thought was the gentle one, intending to drive the mate in ahead of him. He was not long in discovering his mistake in his selection, and the apparently passive steed developed some energetic tendencies quite unexpected, which for a short time seemed to threaten a disastrous ending to the day of pleasure. With a sudden short and loud whinny the aroused beast bounded down the hill at a break neck pace, jumping the ditches still logged, and occasionally turning a somersault, through all of which the rider kept his seat, but loudly proclaimed his desire for assistance. Some of the other members of the party ran out to intercept the maddened steed in his wild flight, but only succeeded in turning horse and rider into the low overhanging limbs of a large thorny locust tree, where the frightened young man was almost dragged off, but finally succeeded in restoring his equilibrium, when the horse dashed out into the open field again, making a large circle, covering the same ground already gone over, and finally returning to the spot where the frightened companions had gathered. The horse was captured and the young man taken from his perilous position, badly lacerated by the thorns, and almost overcome with fright.

Monday morning he was sufficiently recovered to resume his labors, but at this time it is said he is still very nervous and shows visible effects of the trying ordeal through which he was forced to undergo.
